Christchurch uninhabitable for months
With a possible toll of up to 350 dead, last week's earthquake may be New Zealand's worst disaster
The earthquake in Christchurch may go down as New Zealand's worst disaster according to the Prime Minister John Key on the death toll reached 145 with more than 200 people missing. Engineers and planners said the city centre will take months to fix up. Engineers and planners said the damaged centre may be completely unusable for months and that at least a third of the buildings must be razed and rebuilt after last Tuesday's 6.3-magnitude quake.
On the outer edge of the central district, Brent Smith watched in central Canterbury's Ivelston (CTV) building above, where dozens of foreign students from an international school were believed trapped. But Christchurch Police Superintendent Russell Gibson said rescuers weren't completely ruling out good news. "I have talked to experts who say they've worked on buildings like this overseas and got miracles," he said.
The King's Education Language School released a list of missing people presumed to be in the building: nine teachers and 51 students - 26 Japanese, 14 Chinese, six Filipinos, three Thai, one South Korean and one Czech. An additional 17 students

At last, the euro is born
BY JOHN LACHRYELLA
The European Union, now 15 years old, has at last achieved its long-sought goal of introducing a single currency. The euro is born.
The euro is the first of a series of milestones that will lead to a single currency for the continent. It is the first step towards a single currency for the continent. It is the first step towards a single currency for the continent.
